Not illustrated. 1882 edition. Excerpt: ...from Harvard College, and in later years he perpetuated his memories of the Revolution in the huge paintings now in the Rotunda at Washington.) The Continental troops restored the works almost immediately, under the command of Lieut.-Col. Paul Revere; and when the French frigate Hertnionne, 36, sailed up the harbor in 1779, bearing the Marquis de Lafayette, Castle William gave her a good republican salute. In 1778 Gridley renewed the works, under the direction of Congress; he being then chief engineer of the Continental army. The rubbish was removed, as far as possible; and an epaulement arose on the site of the Shirley bastion, armed with disabled guns left here, to which new trunnions had been added. When the British frigate Somerset was wrecked on Cape Cod, in 1778, her armament of 21 handsome 32-pounders was saved, and mounted on the Castle. The garrison during much of the Revolution consisted of an invalid corps, and the barracks were used as a station for recruits. When Washington visited Boston in 1789, the batteries here made grand salutes. A contemporary picture shows the island as a high embrasured bluff, with several plain buildings on and about it, a pier running out toward the channel, and a preternaturally long flag. At this time there were 150 cannon on the island, most of which had been abandoned by the British when they fled from Boston. The first salute fired here by a British frigate in honor of the American flag was in 1791, when H.B.M.S. Alligator sailed up the harbor, and discharged thirteen guns when passing the Castle, which were returned by the artillerists on the island. The commander of the Alligator was Sir Isaac Coffin, a native of Boston, who afterwards became a famous British admiral. In 1799 the Duke of...
